The subject of low-income Americans came up at last night's vice presidential debate, when Paul Ryan was asked whether it is fair to claim that people earning less than $25,000 a year are not paying their fair share of taxes. Yes, he said, but that's just the truth. "I believe very strongly that people who work hard shouldn't be in poverty," Ryan explained. "I want to help them get up and out of poverty. I believe this is a moral obligation. We take care of our people, our neighbor, and I think the virtue of our nation is we provide opportunity for everybody who wants to go. That's what we have to do." He was met with a relative smattering of applause. The debate came amid a barrage of statistics about the economic struggles of Americans on the brink. One-quarter of Americans are living in or near poverty, and low-income families are likely to see their incomes decline in 2014, the National Journal noted. The numbers are troubling. But a divide in what both parties are saying about the issue is equally troubling -- because the two candidates, with a different tone, back similar economic policies, and were virtually equally responsible for setting the stage. Romney made it clear in his campaign autobiography that he believes in
