Updates come in two waves, the first in August and the second in October. Major changes in the earlier update included the Mac version and CS3-like Bridge workflow integration, plus new export filter options. The second update brought many features to the Windows and Macintosh applications. In addition, Adobe acknowledged the fact that the macOS application still lagged behind in some areas. Therefore, Adobe expounded on its commitment to focus on enhancing Photoshop for the Touch Bar, which gradually works its way into screen real estate on the right side of the application.

The initial iteration of the software is really a stable release. (Mac) The Windows version in particular is fairly rich and nearly complete. If you spend a lot of time working with photos, or if you need to use a Mac version for your photographs, both the software and the hardware will serve you well.

The original version of Photoshop did not have batch process and eventually stopped developing the feature, even though the Basic Draw command was capable of batch processing. (However, it took several versions of Basic Draw before the feature became available in many other Creative Suite applications.) Now, the process of mass duplicating multiple objects is so simple and effective that it is a guarantee to save time.

There are more features in this relatively new version than I expected, so it can be intimidating to choose which ones to use. Before we get to that, we must talk about how to navigate the application. If you press the standard and "g" keys when you make an object, you can navigate up and down through the layers and select groups. You can also navigate to your document and then through the organizational structure via these keys.

Although Photoshop has a number of powerful tools, it's not a comprehensive program. Such programs as Adobe Bridge, Photoshop Elements, Adobe Lightroom and other tools are worth a look if you fit your needs in those programs. A program that you can use for free is a major advantage as it makes it easier to test and experiment with new techniques and software. If you have a specific task to work on, it would be best to use a program that is better suited to that sort of work.
