Balanced Noise Reduction USES the technique known as Adaptive Histogram Equalization to reduce the visibility of objects, including distracting background elements. This feature works in the following ways: 1) Captures and displays high-frequency detail in the image and damps low-frequency detail to give the region of interest sharpness. Using its color, density and texture data, the USES sophisticated proprietary algorithms. 2) Creates a new histogram with a wider dynamic range. Applies new type of noise reduction algorithm over a new histogram with a wider dynamic range means that it does not change the median brightness of the highlights or shadows. As a result, the image will look less cluttered with a distinctive contours and tonal graduation. 3) Preserves all detail in the brightest and darkest areas. Similar to white areas and black areas as well. 4) Uses the Adaptive Histogram Equalization based on frequency. Provides a more accurate representation of the subject with a more accurate, processed image. The USES a sophisticated technique to break down the pixels into a frequency spectrum based on color, and frequency, then seeks to reduce noise at each level.

The challenge is that we are in the middle of these transitions that need to happen at a pace that we can help guide and inform our users as they embark on their new journey.
