A type of filter that can be applied to any object is called an alpha channel. The creation of an alpha layer in the Choose Tool, is listed under the document window as New Alpha Channel, and it is generally located in the Create &Layers window. The alpha layer is basically an adjustment layer with a dainty checkerboard pattern applied to its translucent background.

There are plenty of options and features in the adjustment layers, if you're not sure what all the little buttons do. Here's a quick look at some of the very common options. An opacity slider (either set to 0% right away or starting with the transparency your image has) makes most colors in the picture visible or nonexistent based on how much the color is transparent. A Hue/Saturation panel allows you to change the color of an image no matter what your original colors are. A Curves panel allows you to change the intensity of colors. An Exposure panel allows you to change the brightness and contrast of your picture.

Most digital cameras have a setting that provides the most convenient way to delete the unwanted parts of the shot. When you create your picture, you can choose to delete a section of the photo or wipe the entire shot. Both methods make for quick and convenient cleanup of the picture. Because deleting tends to enlarge the selection, you can create a section of the image that is not enlarged as much and then move the selection around. This is often best for creating a special effect.
